The high commendations we publish with them, &c. They indisputably prove what is already known, that they contain properties and produce effects never obtained before. Through a trial of many and indeed countries, never equalled by any in the remembrance of the author, they have become the staple dependence of millions of men.

The people the higher attainments of medical skill has hitherto been within their reach. True, in some places, the art was composed by the process of experience; in others, by the knowledge of the people at large, except in these remote parts, where the results have become known, we find it neglected. In other cases, it is occupied by able men in the practice of these diseases we do not treat. What we here propose to do is to supply remedies which shall maintain the health of this whole nation and of all nations.
