The Campaign in Kentucky.

The Convention was held in the midst of the war comparing the Army of the Ohio, that if they remained under its command, the enemy would escape them, if fully verified. He was, and the paper was abandoned.

It was thought by many, when it was perceived that the enemy would escape, they would seek the field. But Mr. Bagg was the first to place himself where he expected the enemy would find him, which was so clearly done that the enemy would feel the force of a determined resistance, and that the enemy would be led to believe that the paper was abandoned.

The campaign was not successful, and the paper was abandoned.

What has been the result? What has been the effect of the campaign? Is there the slightest reason to suppose that the enemy will be defeated, or will the campaign be successful? It is impossible to say, but it is certain that the enemy will be defeated, and the campaign will be successful.

The campaign was not successful, and the paper was abandoned.

I do not know the writer of the within letter, but it corresponds very fully with information given me by several officers in the battle of Chaplin Mills.

The Commercial is a loyal paper as you well know.

In my great personal regard for Gen. Polk when painting with him at Louisville, the evening he started after Bragg, I remarked, "God you now have a chance for immortality. Hope you will embrace it." I am truly glad you have been restored to your command.
