Abstract A former advertising executive, William Benton served as a part-time Vice-President from 1937-1945 and was primarily responsible for the university's public affairs and broadcasting activities. This collection contains the records and correspondence of the University of Chicago's Office of the Vice-President, comprising the administration of William Benton. Included are correspondence, reports, publications, and other administrative records related to university events and issues within his mandate; as well as material related to Benton's broadcasting, public relations, and media relations work on behalf of the university. The collection contains a significant number of items related to the production of the University of Chicago's well-known Round Table radio program, broadcast nationwide from 1933-1955.

Historical Note

Originally an advertising executive and broadcasting entrepreneur, William Benton retired from the advertising world in 1935 and accepted an offer from the University of Chicago's president, Robert M. Hutchins, to undertake a short term study of the university's public relations. After completing the study, Benton assumed the post of part-time vice-president in 1937, overseeing the university's public affairs and broadcasting initiatives until 1945.

As part of Benton's plan to improve the University of Chicago's public image in the wake of accusations that it was a haven for left-wing radicalism, as well as to increase its visibility and prestige, both Benton and Hutchins gave a great number of public talks, especially to the business community. Moreover, Benton's office arranged for Hutchins and prominent faculty members to write articles and be interviewed as experts for various media.

One of Benton's most successful projects was the University of Chicago's Round Table radio program, which was launched as a local broadcast in 1931 and was picked up by the National Broadcasting Company (NBC) in 1933. It was thereafter aired as a national broadcast until 1955. The Alfred P. Sloan Foundation, a private trust providing grants for projects related to science, technology, and economic performance, began sponsoring the weekly broadcasts in 1938.

The standard Round Table format involved three speakers, usually two university faculty members and one guest speaker, and dealt with contemporary – often controversial – social, political and economic issues. Though it quickly emerged as one of the most popular radio programs of the time, it was also criticized for having a leftist bias, especially by NBC. The latter pushed for more network control over its content and sought to impose commercial standards on its scholarly approach. Alfred P. Sloan, himself, criticized the program after a 1945 broadcast in which the liberal economist and philosopher Friedrich Hayek faced off with two faculty members, Charles E. Merriam and Maynard C. Krueger. Sloan viewed the program as unfairly harsh in its treatment of Hayek, and this temporarily jeopardized the program's relationship with the Foundation. During the Second World War, most of the Round Table's programming was related to developments in the war and the American military effort.

Benton also successfully launched the radio program The Human Adventure, which aired 1939-1945. The program showcased faculty research on a wide range of topics, including scientific, historical and cultural phenomena; however, it was less successful than the Round Table at attracting a broad audience. Aside from radio, Benton was keen to develop the University of Chicago's capacity for producing educational films, but his efforts in this realm were not as fruitful as his radio endeavors.

In early 1942, Benton was appointed by the U.S. War Department as Coordinator of the Orientation Courses of the Bureau of Public Relations for the Sixth Corps Area (comprising Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan). This position involved organizing lectures on different regions of the world, political developments, and international relations for the officer orientation courses held by the various Midwestern military camps of this area. In 1945, Benton officially left the university, accepting the position of Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, which involved consolidating wartime information agencies and creating new information bodies for the post-war era.

Scope Note

The collection is composed primarily of the correspondence of Benton and his associates involved in public relations and broadcasting at the University of Chicago. As well as incoming and outgoing correspondence of William Benton, there is also correspondence of Benton's assistant John P. Howe, and Sherman Dyer, Radio Director for the university. It also contains correspondence with university administrators and faculty, university donors, trustees, and alumni, the commercial publishing and broadcasting community, and a broad array of well-known figures in politics, film, athletics and other fields. A large part of the collection is devoted to the University of Chicago's broadcasting projects, which Benton and his associates believed had great educational significance. In particular, it includes materials related to the production of the famous nation-wide Round Table radio program.

Several items within the collection deal with contemporary issues and events at the University of Chicago, including the ongoing debate over President Hutchins' abolition of varsity football in 1939; preparations for celebrations for the fiftieth anniversary of the university in 1942; logistics for bringing in special guest speakers and researchers, and the university's public relations in the wake of accusations in the mid-1930s that it was a haven for left-wing radicalism. The collection also deals with Benton's and the University of Chicago's activities during the Second World War.

The collection is organized alphabetically, with individual files for each academic year (not calendar year) from 1937-1946. The bulk of this collection spans the years 1937-1946 and the tenure of William Benton as Vice-President. A few letters from 1936 are filed with reference to events that occurred in academic year 1937-1938.
